9. Research Degrees:

PhD on:

Federalism and the Formation of States in India.

The study made an attempt to examine the pros and cons as well as the politics of federalisation pertaining to Telangana and HK region encompasses about the local politics including people's participation, interaction between the state institutions and people of the region, development and state initiated policies and programmes of four villages in two districts in each state in detail. It was found that the nature of Indian federalisation shifted from 'language' to 'development' in due course of time and the regional issues have been neglected for which regions and sub-regions are emerging with many regional issues and demanding for separate statehood or regional autonomy or special status etc as surveyed from the literatures. On the other hand, the fate of a newly formed or assigned autonomy or special assistance to any state exclusively depends on the party at the centre as well as the political culture and ideology of the concerned state as found in both the state of Telangana and Karnataka with regard to their federalisation. This research involved an empirical study of two Indian states namely, Telangana and Hyderabad Karnataka region (Karnataka) under the Indian union. Considering HDI report of two states as the reference point for this study, empirical research was carried out in two districts of each state as per their performance level. The selection of Mandals and villages were based on the basis of distance from the district headquarter (city) in order to understand their existing regional inequalities, level of political participation within the region that led for demanding separate statehood for Telangana and 'special status' for HK region in Karnataka.

Supervisor: Dr. V Anil Kumar (Associate Professor)

M. Phil on:

The Role of Pacnhayat Raj in Joint Forest Management: A case study of Kashipur block in Odisha.

This empirical research was carried out in two villages of a block in Odisha in view of their development and obtaining benefits from the JFM programme. It examined the interaction between PRIs, forest department and the locals who dwells in and around the forest areas in terms of their livelihood and development. The study found that the implementation of JFM significantly did not have positive impact on the region and the people. There is a huge gap between the awareness among the people of those villages in Odisha with regard to JFM programme on the one hand and also found institutional accountability and communicational gap between the local institutions also exist in the block.

Supervisor: Dr. P. Lazarus Samraj (Professor)
